This is late, but they're first rate.

And now they're here in Vernon and will be playing tonight in a benefit concert to support Vernon's budding music students at the Vernon Community Music School.

Vancouver's Infinitus Quartet (www.infinitusquartet.com) have even played for the Dalai Lama.

With a couple of violins, a viola and a cello, Infinitus blends and twists classical music with bebop, jazz, hip hop and Latin.

The Infinitus Quartet have been playing throughout the Okanagan for the past few weeks, and is wrapping up its tour in Vernon.

The quartet's show is loaded with audience participation, talking back and forth, all the while maintaining the highest quality of music.

And it doesn't matter how old you are, or how young. They play for audiences from nine months old to 99 years young – to rappers and hipsters in hoodies and jeans, and people with hip replacements in nursing homes.

“You can be young, and play jazz, classical, or hip hop on string instruments and you don't have to fit a certain mold,” said violinist John “Adidam” Littlejohn, whose nickname is an acronym for All Day I Dream About Music.

“We've played at kindergartens, nursing homes, and reserves. We've taken a float plane out to an island off Bella Coola to play for a one-room schoolhouse with 11 kids in Grades 1 to 7 with no fifth graders. It was cool.”

The four musicians are all between the ages of 25 and 29. Twins Alex and Anthony Cheung play the cello and viola respectively, and Josh Belvedere plays violin along with Littlejohn.

Infinitus has played for hospices, at times not getting any obvious response.

“We all have the passion for outreach, to better any community that we can,” said Littlejohn.

Infinitus members are not asking for any money for themselves. They just want to support music here in the Okanagan. So come, pay what you like. If you feel like supporting young musicians, you can drop something in the donation basket. But mostly, just come, bring your kids, or your grandparents, and enjoy throwing the generation gap way out the window.

The Infinitus Quartet plays the Vernon Community Music School's Carriage House Loft, 1705 32nd Ave., at 7 p.m. tonight. Admission is by donation.
